

The new Ashcroft Internet Snooping request is un-American. I strongly object to being treated like a criminal, since I'm not. This would give the government the ability compile lists of people interested in things that, while perfectly legal, might be very controversial. This will only enable the further Nixon-ification of the government. The FBI and other law enforcement agencies have plenty of tools already at their disposal. Besides, if the system is open for the FBI to snoop around, it's only a matter of time before somebody somewhere figures out how to get in themselves, thus leaving every innocent user of any private network open to the most ruthless attacks, that they could never defend against. This is crap, guys, and it's your job as the FCC to protect the public's interest in matters like this. Please do so.